I wish to express the opinion that all such experiments are of little scientific value. Our best diet lessons can be learned from observing the diet and health of whole tribes of people during long periods of time. They are all to be found for the looking, for the world is large and in some place, among some people, every class of food known is used as a principal diet. Experimental attempts to feed animals upon an ash free diet have all shown that the animals die in a shorter time than if given no food at all. This is no doubt due quite as much to the introduction of deleterious matters generated in the processes of preparation as to the absence of the salts. It is plain that a diet consisting of bacon, beans, cheese, butter and such foods...
